Key Institutional Changes

The authors identify several key institutional changes that are driving the transformation of the global economy. These include:

- The rise of digital technologies: Digital technologies are transforming the way that businesses operate and the way that consumers interact with the economy. This is leading to new forms of competition, new business models, and new ways of organizing work.
- The increasing interconnectedness of global markets: The increasing interconnectedness of global markets is creating new opportunities for businesses to reach new customers and suppliers. This is also leading to new forms of competition, as businesses from different countries compete for market share.
- The changing role of governments: The changing role of governments is another key institutional change that is shaping the global economy. Governments are increasingly playing a role in regulating the digital economy and in promoting economic development. They are also playing a role in addressing the challenges of inequality and environmental sustainability.
