Hedges writes that we are facing a global pandemic, a climate emergency, and a rise in authoritarianism and fascism. He argues that these crises are interconnected, and that they are all symptoms of a deeper crisis: the crisis of capitalism.

Hedges argues that capitalism is a system that is inherently destructive. It is a system that is based on the exploitation of people and the planet, and it is a system that is leading us to disaster.

But Hedges also argues that there is hope. He believes that we can still avert the worst effects of the crises we are facing if we are willing to make radical changes to our way of life.

What We Do Next Really Matters is a call for radical hope. It is a call for us to believe that we can create a better world, and to take the actions necessary to make that world a reality.

Here are some of the key ideas in What We Do Next Really Matters:

- We are living in a time of unprecedented crisis.
- The crises we are facing are interconnected, and they are all symptoms of a deeper crisis: the crisis of capitalism.
- Capitalism is a system that is inherently destructive.
- There is hope. We can still avert the worst effects of the crises we are facing if we are willing to make radical changes to our way of life.
